Falling Waters Trail

The 10.5-mile Falling Waters Trail connects the village of Concord with the City of Jackson where it continues as the Jackson Inter-City Trail. Built on an abandoned stretch of the former Michigan Central Railroad, the 12-foot-wide asphalt multi-use trail is one of Michigan’s most popular rail-trail destinations – and for many good reasons.

The Falling Waters Trail travels through a geologic region of springs and lakes in Jackson County that form the headwaters of four major Michigan rivers. Native Americans called this area “The Land of Falling Waters.” At the western trailhead in Concord, the trail crosses a bridge over the Kalamazoo River where you can view a great expanse of marshy wetlands. One of the highlights of the trail is a causeway that runs through the middle of Lime Lake. This is a great place to stop, relax, view wildlife and enjoy the natural beauty of this turquoise blue lake. Along the way, the trail passes through a lush landscape of wetlands, shady woodlands and fields of beans and corn. This is a trail you will want to visit time and time again to experience the seasonal changes in scenery.

Jackson Inter-City Trail

As the trail crosses east over Weatherwax Road, it enters the City of Jackson and changes its name to the Jackson Inter-City Trail. This 3.4-mile section of trail travels through quiet suburban neighborhoods, then turns north and follows Cooper Street to downtown Jackson and the Grand River ArtsWalk.

Grand River ArtsWalk

Dedicated in 2010, The Grand River ArtsWalk is a 1.5-mile multi-use trail that travels through Jackson’s growing arts and entertainment district. It’s also an important link in a long-range plan to build a continuous bike trail from South Haven to Port Huron. The current trail route begins where Cooper Street meets the Grand River. From there, continue west on Michigan Avenue and go north on Mechanic Street through the Armory Art Village (historic site of former state prison). Follow the paved path north along the banks of the Grand River.

The Falling Waters Trail crosses a causeway through the middle of picturesque Lime Lake.
